When a call comes in...

Our switchboard is manned 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, by certified medical practitioners. They are fluent in English, French, Portuguese and Arabic, and offer expert, calm, reassuring help, before rapidly assessing the urgency of the situation.

During the call, we determine whether the patient needs to be transported to one of Africa’s state-of-the-art hospitals or is best served through a nearby, top-of-the-range health clinic. Our land transport and aircraft teams are scrambled, and the process of medical evacuation is go...

For Aeroworx, it's personal

GRAHAM LAMBERT, founder of Aeroworx, was standing in a hospital corridor in Mozambique. "A doctor walked slowly towards me, deliberately avoiding eye contact. I could tell from his face, all was not well.

"He looked up slowly to face me and spoke... He could save my pregnant wife or our baby, but not both. What was I meant to say? It was an impossible decision.

"I took a deep breath, thought of my wife and our unborn child. No. I refused to accept this.

"I mustered all help and finances I could. I contacted anyone I thought could help. I explored every option in the short time I had. It was one of the worst moments of my life...

"In the end, I was fortunate. I managed to find the means to get my wife to a suitable hospital – thankfully, both mother and baby were saved. But it was an experience I was determined no-one else should ever have to go through.

"That's why I started Aeroworx. In an emergency, everyone should be able to get the medical help they need. And easily, with just one phone call.

"So, that's what Aeroworx is: a single-point solution for medical evacuations all over Africa. As soon as that phone rings, we organise everything and get patients to the care they need in the fastest possible time.

"How I would have loved to know back then, that a single phone call could have solved all our problems."

"It was an experience I was determined no-one else should ever have to go through"
